Insurance is a notoriously boring, even painful, subject; one of life's burdens towards which we only begrudgingly direct our attention. There are several explanations one could put forth as to why, some relating to disreputable practices (pushy salesmen, unethical denial of claims, etc) others pertaining to the mind-numbing details contained in lengthy contractual boiler-plate which most folks regrettably (if understandably) gloss over prior to committing their signatures. In no small part, human psychology plays a role, finding it distasteful to shell out for services that provide no immediate, tangible benefit ("I paid all this money and all I got was this lousy policy") or to contemplate the various accidents and incidents to which we are all too vulnerable. And yet, for all the loathing associated with the subject, a strong case can be made for insurance as the foundation of financial security, a benefit to both individuals and society- its importance is only magnified by the disdain with which it is treated. In fact, purely as a matter of prudence, insurance should be considered as the foundation upon which a family may erect other household "programs" (ie, emergency fund, long-term investment, living wills). Jack Hungelmann's "Insurance for Dummies" rectifies this situation of malign neglect with 300+ pages of highly practical, jargon-free information for each of six specific categories of insurance: 1) auto insurance 2) home insurance 3) umbrella (liability) insurance 4) health insurance 5) disability insurance 6) life insurance A functional (if not dictionary) definition of insurance is "management of risk". Bearing this in mind, Mr.
